32. Students need to spend much time studying words. Words are at the foundation of learning. They are key to establishing meaning in text. We need them to think and express ideas throughout our life. Students with a lot of words score higher on achievement tests than students with fewer words. Also, because words are directly related to knowledge of concepts, having many words enables students to achieve higher standards in school and, later, at work. Thus, it is necessary for students to study words.

38. There are different types of families in the United States. For example, there are divorced parents and unmarried couples bringing up their children together. Therefore, I suggest that the government take this variety of households into account. There are many experts with the same viewpoint as mine. They say, "There are a lot of different forms of families, so we can no longer pretend that families come with a mother, a father, and several children." They add that we need to admit that reality and support all different kinds of families.

39. Researchers want to get an accurate idea about why individuals have different ideas about time and pace of life. To study this, they look at people's ideas of "time urgency." Time urgency is the effort a person makes to achieve as much as possible in a given amount of time. Everyone has his or her own sense of time urgency. Some people feel the need to try to achieve a lot, while other people have the tendency to set their goals lower and achieve less. The fact is that what is too fast for one person might be boring for another. There is nothing good or bad about an individual's pace of life.

42. Russell Conwell, a famous educator, gathered data on wealthy and successful people. His data showed that out of the 4,043 millionaires, only 69 had even a high school education. They lacked money. They lacked training. But they had the urge to get somewhere and they succeeded. Compare that with the figures Conwell gathered on the sons of rich men. Only one in seventeen died wealthy. Having no urge to get ahead, they not only failed to make their mark, but they lost what they already had. The first essential to success is a feeling of desire for something you don't have.

A new theory called "survival of the nicest" says that because of kindness, the human race prospered as a species. Professor Sam Bowles analyzed ancient societies and found that kindness was a key element for the survival of communities. "Groups with many kind people have survived. They cooperate and contribute to the well-being of fellow group members," he says. Other researches showed kindness could also make us happier and mentally healthier. They found that people who performed a wide variety of kind acts reported much higher levels of happiness.

(A) Not too long ago, (a) a guest checking out of a Polynesian Village resort at Walt Disney World was asked how she enjoyed her visit. She told the front-desk clerk she had enjoyed a wonderful vacation, but was heartbroken about losing several rolls of film she had not yet developed.

(B) The manager asked (b) the woman to leave him a few rolls of fresh film, promising he would handle the rest. Two weeks later, this guest received a package at her home. In it were photos of the entire cast of the Luau show, personally autographed by each performer. There were also photos of the parade taken by the manager on his own time, after work.

(C) She thought that (c) she had never received such warm-hearted service before. The lesson we can get from this story about true customer satisfaction is quite clear. Heroic service does not come from policy manuals. It comes from people who care and from a culture that encourages and models that attitude.

(D) The loss of the pictures she had shot at the Luau show made (d) the visitor particularly upset, as this was a precious memory. The clerk said, "Please understand we have no written service standards covering lost snapshots." Fortunately, (e) the manager at the front desk understood the true service philosophy.

Ninety percent of the human race is likely to feel motion sickness of one kind or another. Some people become sick when they sit in the back seat of a car. Others get motion sickness on airplanes, motorcycles, amusement park rides, and even on camels! Scientists have learned that motion sickness occurs when the brain is trying to make sense of a situation and there are too many _____ messages. While the eyes are sending one message, the ears, skin, and bone joints are sending other messages.

Avoiding travel is not always possible so travelers should use some well-known strategies to avoid getting sick. The most useful strategy concerns food; eat a light meal before traveling. Care in choosing the location of your seat is another important strategy. In a car, sit in the front seat. On a plane, sit near the wings. A large number of travelers use pressure bands on their wrists. People who think might get sick can take medicine beforehand.
