Tall-growing orchids need a little extra support to stay upright, but the stakes they lean on are usually an eyesore. To keep the beauty of the blooms, purchase floral-stem wires from a crafts store. Bend into a 90-degree angle four inches from the top. Curve the top portion to form a U shape. Plant the stake next to the orchid, and hook the U shape around the stem.

There are five different types of corn. Popcorn is the only variety that will pop consistently. According to a scientist, other corns might pop on occasion but with little regularity. The key to popcorn's ability is, amazingly, water. Each popcorn core contains water, which most popcorn processors try to maintain at about 13.5 percent. The water is stored in a small circle of soft starch in each core. Surrounding the soft starch is a hard enamel-like starch. When the core is heated for popping, the water inside heats and begins to expand. The function of the hard starch is to resist the water as long as possible. When the water expands with such pressure that the hard starch gives way, the water bursts out, causing the core to explode. The soft starch pops out. The water, converted into steam, is released, and the corn pops. The other four varieties of corn are able to store water effectively. But their outer starch isn't hard enough to resist the water pressure of the expanding core, so nothing happens.

Hours before a game, beneath major league baseball's newest stadium, one of the sport's oldest rituals is under way. Two Washington Nationals bat boys are rubbing brown clay on dozens of new balls. Only when they're done can the umpire yell, "Play ball!" The clay has been helping pitchers get a grip for 70 years. After a wild pitch killed a batter in 1920, a tacky substance was sought. Shoe polish and tobacco juice didn't stick. So a type of clay was used. The clay was found in a New Jersey swamp. In 1938 it became a big-league staple and in 1968 it made the Hall of Fame.

Some people shrink when they see a rat, but a scientist smiles. A scientist devised a way for rats to help solve a global problem such as searching for land mines. Dogs are often used to find the land mines out, but he knew rats were easier to train. Rats are also light, so they don't blow up the land mines they find; they stay healthy in tropical areas, where many explosives are buried; and they're cheap to breed and raise. In the late 1990s he chose the African giant rat, with its very sensitive nose, for training: If the rats scratched the ground when they sniffed explosives, they got a reward. More than 30 trained sniffer rats have started sweeping minefields in Uganda, where they've cleared almost a quarter square mile.

The significance and meaning of the construction of the Pyramids are uniquely sacred and religious. A pyramid is a huge but simple structure made to commemorate a dead king. The dead king had to continue to exist in the afterlife because he became divine and had to assure the welfare and survival of his people. The most important pyramids were not constructed by a lot of humiliated slaves, but by the mass of Egyptian farmers, who were motivated to participate in something sacred.

A car boot sale is a mainly British kind of market in which private individuals come together to sell household and garden goods. The term refers to the selling of items from an automobile's "boot" in the UK, or "trunk" in the U.S.A. Although a small proportion of sellers are professional traders selling new goods, or seconds, the goods on sale are often used but no longer wanted personal possessions. Car boot sales encourage people to recycle still useful but unwanted domestic items that previously would have been thrown away. In the U.S.A. a car boot sale would be considered something between a garage sale or yard sale and a flea market or swap meet. Unlike car boot sales, however, people need to have a business license when they want to sell something in a flea market in the U.S.A.

Turkeys have never been raised to produce eggs for human consumption, because it is much less expensive to produce chicken eggs. "Turkeys are raised for meat production, which results in high body weight and low egg production," says a professor of Warwick University. A female turkey weighs between 9.5 and 15 kilograms during the laying period of her life, while a chicken weighs just over one kilogram. Hence, the nutrient requirements to maintain a turkey's weight are much greater than those of a chicken. Plus, the laying period for a turkey is much shorter: During its reproductive lifespan, a turkey will produce 15 to 25 eggs averaging 90 grams each, while a chicken will yield 300 eggs of about 55 grams each.

After gaining independence, many nations try to establish a democracy. But a democracy is difficult to maintain. A dictatorship is perhaps the easiest government to set up. Most often, the person with the most military power takes charge. They can usually do this in only a few hours. A democracy, on the other hand, is very difficult to create. It needs three main elements. First, democracy needs experience. This comes with time. People need to establish democratic traditions. In the United States, for example, it took a long time before true democracy was established. The United States became independent in 1776, but slavery was legal for quite a long time after. Women could not vote until 1920. Second, democracy needs a middle class. When there is only an upper class and a lower class, there is often fighting. The upper class might treat the lower class poorly. A democracy needs teachers, business owners, and others who are neither very rich nor very poor. The third need of a democracy is public education. A democracy must have citizens who can read and think about important issues. Then they can make wise choices when voting. Many former colonies lacked experience, a middle class, and educated citizens. So dictators took over many nations in Latin America, Asia and Africa.
